Ten Things to Know About Trauma and Learning

The brain undergoes dramatic changes during adolescence, offering young people the chance to heal from trauma experienced early in life with targeted support and invention. But because of these changes in the brain, adolescents are particularly vulnerable to the impact of trauma, which can impede their development and learning.

September's Brown vs. Board Challenge: Race, Equity, and Schools

At a time when more than half of our nation's public-school students are students of color, conversations about race and inequality are happening in schools—between students, with teachers, among leadership, and communities. In September, All4Ed's #OurChallengeOurHope campaign highlights how schools are tackling issues of race and equity—from the classroom all the way to the statehouse.

Show Your Support for Wi-Fi in Schools

Join over 100 school and district leaders who have demonstrated support for Wi-Fi in schools by opposing the suggested actions of Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to cap spending on critical funds and programs that promote digital equity. You can show your opposition to the FCC's proposal by sharing the following tweet or other social posts available at futureready.org/wifi.

Deeper Learning Digest: Is School Innovation Lost in the Education Echo Chamber?

If a school is making a difference for students through new and innovative practices and word gets lost in the education echo chamber, how can other schools and students benefit?

This digest highlights a new project by the Christensen Institute to uncover under-the-radar schools that are transforming the learning process and driving better outcomes for students, a California district that is transforming schools with lessons from brain science, strategies to refresh school culture, and an upcoming conference on the future of K-12 education.
